GDP revenue per person per Country

I saw this in a post by an American Professor Jack Britt. He's a fascinating guy and someone I was fortunate enough to have met and spend time with at a conference a couple of years ago. He was basically demonstrating the difference in GDP (gross domestic product) revenue demonstrated as a value per person living there. I find it fascinating as a couple of the countries at the top are not what I expected and we are not as high up as you might think and I guess that's mainly a reflection of a lot of people on a small island, and maybe a lot of them are not contributing much to GDP?
